Creating Wildlife Corridors

Wildlife corridors are safe, connected routes that help animals move between habitats. In towns and cities, natural spaces are often broken up by roads, fences and buildings, making it harder for creatures like hedgehogs, birds, insects and small mammals to find food, shelter and mates. By creating simple links between green spaces, we can help local wildlife travel more freely and keep our ecosystems healthy.

Families can support wildlife corridors right at home. Leaving small gaps under garden fences allows hedgehogs to roam safely. Planting native flowers in pots, borders or window boxes creates stepping-stones for bees and butterflies. Even a row of shrubs or a patch of long grass can act as a mini-corridor, giving insects shelter as they move from one area to another. These small changes help turn individual gardens into part of a larger, connected network.

If every family creates just one wildlife friendly link this week, we'll build a chain of safe pathways across our community.

Together, we can make it easier for local species to thrive and give our children a richer, more connected natural world to explore.
